Tammany Hall, corrupt politicians were kept in office as his gang furnished free coal and flour, small bribes, and little jobs in return for votes. It has been estimated that by the fall of 1871 Tweed's ring had made some twenty million dollars for its members. The greatest source of revenue was the construction of the New York City courthouse; this had been planned in 1868 at a cost not to exceed $250,000, but by 1871 its contractors, controlled by Tammany, had charged the city eight million dollars, and the edifice was still uncompleted.

Private business exhibited the same ethics as government, with the titans of finance now joining forces to mulct the public, now warring among themselves. There was, for example, the feud over the Erie Railroad, with Gould, Drew, and Fisk on one side and Vanderbilt on the other. To profit by their temporary control of the line, this trio printed hundreds of thousands of watered shares, won millions of dollars for themselves, and, quite incidentally, caused a panic that ruined the financial structure of the railroad and the money market in general. In the end Fisk cheerfully declared, "Nothing is lost save honor." It was no wonder that the general public was at one and the same time dazzled by the ostentatious ways of these Robber Barons and heartily sick of the means by which they made money. It was with disgust that Sidney Lanier, poet from the defeated Confederacy, bitterly wrote:
